What kind of jobs can i get with a masters in public administration

picjumbo.com/Pexels Working remotely has been gaining traction in the United States during the past few years. In fact, from 2005 to 2017, the number of people telecommuting increased by 159%, according to a study from FlexJobs. That trend has continued over the past few years as increasing numbers of workers seek the flexibility of being able to choose their work environments — and as increasing numbers of companies see the cost-saving capabilities of having at least part of their workforce operating off-site. As COVID-19 has swept across the globe in 2020, many employees with suitable roles were given the option to continue on a remote-work basis. However, other workers out there may be looking for new jobs or may be interested in switching to virtual positions entirely. Figuring out which ones are authentic can be tough, but these virtual roles are all in high demand — and legitimate.

Developer There's huge demand for developers across the marketplace, with many businesses offering remote-work opportunities. Indeed notes that many developer jobs are also the hardest to fill, with front-end, full-stack and mobile developer jobs making the top six in-demand roles. Danial RCaROS/Unsplash Every business has its own list of things it looks for in developers. Experience working with programming languages like Python and Java is almost always a must. But there are several different directions to take a career as a developer. For example, mobile developers create the apps used on mobile devices. Front-end developers build websites by taking data and turning it into the site interfaces that users interact with. Back-end developers create the interactive elements of a website, including options to log in, like pictures and create accounts. Finally, full-stack developers work as both front- and back-end developers with extensive knowledge of software development, user experience, quality assurance and security.

Virtual Assistant Virtual assistant jobs vary widely in their tasks and responsibilities. At a minimum, virtual assistants need a computer and an internet connection. You'll also need to be a self-starter with excellent organization skills. After all, whoever hires you is looking for someone who can eliminate some of their stress. KOBU Agency/Unsplash The nature of the job depends on whom you work for. Many virtual assistants are tasked with organizing documents and files, maintaining social media channels and handling billing and accounting issues. Other common tasks include answering and directing phone calls, keeping up with email communications, managing calendars or schedules and researching potential projects and clients.

Medical Transcriptionist As a medical transcriptionist, you take voice recordings made by healthcare professionals and turn them into written reports. Some people work in doctors' offices and hospitals, but many medical transcriptionists can work from home. In most cases, you do need to have a good foundation in medical terminology and grammar. Most employers require candidates to have completed a postsecondary educational course.

CoWomen/Unsplash Online Marketing Digital marketers are in demand. There's been a skills gap in the marketplace for years now, according to Digital Marketing Institute. Some of the most in-demand skills include search engine optimization strategy, website development, brand marketing, content strategy, digital project management and data analytics. You'll essentially be tasked with helping businesses target, engage with and attract consumers by using various online strategies. Campaign Creators/Unsplash For those with the skills needed to perform these jobs well — and the desire to potentially create a remote business — online marketing is a solid option. Some online marketers work as consultants who analyze a business' current online marketing plans to see where the company can improve. Others are hired to create and implement online marketing strategies for the long term.

Designer Graphic design, web design, user experience and user interface all tend to fall under the umbrella of design. It isn't impossible to break into this remote work opportunity with minimal experience, but the most lucrative and stable design jobs are often awarded to candidates with the experience and know-how to get the job done. Experts suggest choosing the kind of designer you want to be and the role that best suits your skills. Then, talk to other designers, take a class and practice your craft. If you don't have a portfolio, start taking on projects to create one.

The Creative Exchange/Unsplash MORE FROM ASKMONEY.COM When you drive through your city or town, you might take notice of traffic signals, sidewalks, landscaping, recreational fields, and fire hydrants. You might see new residential or commercial construction projects or road or utility work. When you're home, you flip on the lights, turn on the water, take out the trash and recycling. There is certainly a lot happening behind the scenes to maintain these services and facilities. That's where the work of public administrators comes in. Why Study Public Administration? If you're interested in contributing to the inner workings of federal, state, or local government, or are passionate about helping a cause or community, a career in public administration may be a good fit for your interests. Advancing into higher-level positions within the public administration field often requires a related graduate degree, such as a master's in public administration (MPA).

What Can I Do With a Master's in Public Administration? "The MPA is considered the culminating degree for people in public or nonprofit management," explains Dr. Kenneth Goldberg, director of the undergraduate and graduate public administration program at National University. Studying public administration at the graduate level, either in an on-site or online degree program, introduces students to the business aspects of managing government programs, offices, and employees at every level. Classes cover a range of skills from budgeting and financial management to research and policy. Goldberg says that, at National, many courses focus on critical thinking, research, and writing. All of these experiences are also beneficial for those in the nonprofit sector, which is why an MPA is often the degree of choice for those looking to lead a community benefit organization. Whether interested in government or a specific cause, Goldberg says students attracted to an MPA program often have an innate calling to the field of public administration. "They have a strong propensity to serve and tend to have a real sense of community," he says, adding that another characteristic he sees in students is a desire to support social good. Goldberg is himself, an example of this social commitment. In 2001, after 30 years of service, he retired from the U.S. Navy. Already driven to serve, he felt public administration was a natural fit. So he decided to pursue advanced studies in the field, earning both his master's and doctorate. When asking yourself, "why study public administration?" you also might find your answer is a mix of personal and professional fulfillment. What Can I Do With A Master's in Public Administration in the Public Sector? Every small town, big city, and major metropolis — and every county and state — requires solid business and organizational expertise to manage people, services, and facilities in their jurisdiction. Here are just a few of the common titles or roles filled by those holding an MPA: City manager. County administrator. Recreation manager. Urban and regional planner. Community relations manager. Director of economic development. Budget manager. Policy analyst. Master's of public administration graduates also often hold leadership roles in waste management, public utilities, law enforcement, emergency services, or other related government offices and programs. Finally, others with an MPA may feel compelled to run for public office or teach at the college level. What Can I Do With A Master's in Public Administration in the Nonprofit Sector? An MPA program also prepares people for high-level or leadership positions in the nonprofit sector, such as within charitable, educational, or arts organizations. Here are just a few nonprofit roles in which you might find an MPA graduate: Executive director. Development director (fundraising). Membership director. Advocacy director. Public relations manager. Program director. Grant administrator. One final way to approach the "why study public administration" question is to consider the increased job opportunities the field offers. For instance, the U.S. Department of Labor reports the need for urban planners is expected to grow by 13 percent in the next decade, a growth rate that is much faster than the average for all occupations. The need for fundraising professionals is expected to grow by 15 percent, also much faster than the average. It's also worth noting that in addition to on-campus options, many master's of public administration programs also are offered as online degrees, such as the one at National. This option allows students to continue working or serving in the military while earning their MPA.
